

School to Parent Communication Case Study: The Man in the Car: Tackling multifaceted situations that principals and teachers encounter daily

This case study was written for graduate education classes in the areas of supervision and school parent communication. These classes were geared to teachers who were obtaining certification to be principals. The scenarios from the textbook that supplemented my instruction in those classes were helpful to a point. Yet, so many times the scenarios in the text did not fit the difficult, multifaceted situations that principals and teachers encounter daily. The case study, The Man in the Car, is an account of a situation in which there are many different levels of concerns and problems. Further, the ramifications of these problems, especially if they go unresolved, are critical. This fictional case study was written for soon to be principals to consider. I used this case study for students to contemplate, analyze and form responses and strategies that would satisfy all the stakeholders that are in a community. No stakeholder can be forgotten when dealing with education and the community. Taxpayers are very important as stakeholders: business people, teachers, senior adults and community leaders all have a stake in what goes on in the educational community. Included in the case study are discussion questions for the students to analyze. Students may analyze these alone and then report to the entire class. Also, students can form groups of 2 or 3 and brainstorm solutions. These discussion questions guide students to explain and analyze all the potential problems and ramifications that could come from those problems if those problems are ignored. Also an important activity is included at the end of the case study and discussion questions. A Stakeholder Chart allows students to consider each player in this situation. Then students list all stakeholders and from that, solutions to the problems can be formed.
